Kosolf '14 Featured on WBUR's Morning Edition for Work Teaching Legal Rights to Students

2016 NEWS ARCHIVES06/20/16

Nate Kosolf '14 was recently featured on WBUR about his work teaching middle school students about their legal rights.

With the increase in recent years of high profile disputes between law enforcement officials and youth, a group of Boston attorneys started a program to teach Boston public school students about the law and their individual rights. In a piece on the show "Morning Edition," Kosolf is featured teaching eighth grade students about their Miranda Rights and how to assert their civil rights. Kosolf tells the students about how to interact with police officers and answers several students' questions, in an effort to help combat negative perceptions of the legal system by educating the youth about the system and their individual rights.

Kosolf, currently an associate at Sullivan and Worcester, was an articles editor for the Boston College Law Review and on a National Moot Court team. As a member of the BC Defenders Clinic, Kosolf tried a criminal case to a jury in Dorchester and won a not guilty verdict for his client. After graduating, he was a key member of the defense team that successfully argued for a new trial for Angel Echavarria, who had served 21 years in prison for a crime he didn't commit (see Boston Globe story).
